Health development in fact is one of the main element of national growth to reach the optimal level of society living. But not all Indonesian people are able to get that factor, therefore, the government give the assurance in Social Secutiry Institute Law number 24, 2011, which used as a guarantee of health assurance to the people who is obligatory, with the expectation is to fulfil the basic needs of health to all the Indonesian people.

The issues that being researched is how the implementation of the social security institution in order to cover the health rights in Bandar lampung, and the resistance factors in the implementation of this program.

The approach problem used on this research is empirical normative approach. The source data used on the research is obtained from the primary data on the field that contains informations from the related parties, and the secondary data contains the informations from research library about the law, literature, books, and other official documents.

As the results of this research, the writer got the outcome that the implementation of BPJS is held by 2 level, first level health care services and advanced level health care services. In the advanced level health care services, is divided into another 2 level, that are secondary health care facilities and tertiary health care facilities, but in the implementation, there are some resistance such as still few hospital that have a partership with the BPJS, and the facility of health care that still far from worthy in Bandar Lampung.
