The luxury fashion products is a very profitable business that has grown phenomenally in the last few decades. But at the same time, consumers have shifted to favor fake luxury brand fashion products (next to be called as counterfeits fashion products). Shifting consumer choices to counterfeits fashion products could be caused by the high price of genuine luxury brand fashion products. The main factor which drive high demand of counterfeits fashion products is the attitude of consumer itself, which follows; value consciousness, brand consciousness, perceived risk, materialism, and social influences included personal income as moderation variable. This research aims to determine the influence of user attitudes on purchasing decisions about counterfeits fashion products which is moderated by personal income. The sample used in this study was 270 data taken by purposive sampling. The data obtained were analysed using structural equation model analysis (SEM) with the help of the LISREL 8.8 application. The results showed that value consciousness and social influences was insignificant influenced. Besides, brand consciousness, perceived risk, and materialism were significant influenced towards attitude. And personal income proven moderated attitude towards purchase decisions of counterfeits fashion products.
