The aim of this study is to evaluate whether the Prakerja card program has economic impact and social impact, as well as to assess the satisfaction of its beneficiaries in Lampung Province. Additionally, it seeks to determine the relationship between economic and social impacts and beneficiary satisfaction. The research employs a descriptive qualitative method with contingency analysis. The respondents are beneficiaries of the Prakerja card in Lampung Province, selected through proportionate stratified random sampling. The findings indicate that the economic impact on beneficiaries is substantial, particularly in enhancing cost efficiency for training and improving financial inclusion. Similarly, the social impact is significant in increasing productivity and fostering entrepreneurship. Contingency table analysis reveals a relationship between economic and social impacts and the satisfaction of Prakerja card beneficiaries.
